FOREWORD

My sincere appreciation to all the "cousins" and friends who gave me so much assistance. Without all of you, this book would not have been possible.

Wherever I could, I tried to get documentary proof. However, fires, wars, and lack of requirement of marriage licenses made it necessary, in some cases, to resort to inference: census records, tombstones, obituaries, and so forth, which indicate a marriage occurred but not when or where. Also, I found that names, places, and dates furnished by family members were not always correct. You will notice that there are a number of marriages which show "No Record." In every case, I checked with the county I had been given and was told there was no such marriage listed. I decided to include them, though, as they may give someone a date or name.

Unless otherwise noted, only the county and state of marriage or license is furnished. Where a census record is used, the presumed place of marriage is usually the state in which the wife was born. However, if the husband and first child were both born in another state, I used that one as I figured the wife's family probably moved there. Also, if a wife came from a state farther east than her husband, they were more likely married either in his home state or in that where the first child was born. People didn't migrate eastward. It was west or south except in rare cases such as North Carolina or Tennessee where some moved north into Kentucky and Indiana.

Name in parenthesis: Nickname or maiden name of widow

Name in brackets: [John] - father's name (not guaranteed correct)

No children: When the census showed "no children", I gave the ages of the husband and wife at the time the census was taken as they might indicate the children were grown, married, and living elsewhere or the couple were newlyweds.

Number in parenthesis: (1) - First, second, third, or fourth marriage

Place of marriage: In each case, the county is given except in New England and parts of New York where records are kept by the towns. When the place is unknown and the census records show both husband and wife were born in the same state, I used that state as the place of marriage. (Not guaranteed correct)
